SECURITY COMMUNITIES AND SECURITY RISK MANAGEMENT IN EUROPE & EAST ASIA

The notion of 'security communities', first coined by Karl Deutsch, continues to be a major framework of reference for the making sense of the complex channels of cooperation on security risks in Europe and the transatlantic area. What do the European and East Asian experiences tell us about the management of the ever more pressing traditional and non-traditional security risks? How can the diverging trends in European and Asian management of security risks be accounted for and what kind of consequences does this have for Europe-China cooperation in strategic affairs and conflict resolution around the world? Which dynamics, institutions, and principles underpin sustainable security arrangements and how can these be generated?
